

Southern Association Release

9:00 PM Wednesday, February 22
for AM's February 23
1956

Andy Cohen brings his ever-present cigar and jaunty personality back to the Southern Association again in his 2nd year as manager of the New Orleans Pels.

Cohen's first edition, never a solid ball club, battled in the 1st division for 152 of 154 games, dropping from 4th to 6th on the last day of the season. However, the balding, fast-talking Cohen proved popular with writers and officials and his astuteness on the field was never in doubt. This year he will go to the Pirates' Ft. Myers, Fla., camp in early March to look after the Pels' interests. He hopes to open with a stronger aggregation.

Cohen came to the Pels after piloting Denver to 2 pennants and 2 No. 2 finishes in his 4 years there. Prior to that he had been manager at the Braves' farm in Eau Claire, Wis.

Andy's baseball career started in 1925 when he forsook a senior year at the University of Alabama, where he was a 3-year, 3-sport standout, to sign a professional contract with the Waco Texas League club. Later that first season, Andy's services were sold to the New York Giants for the then fabulous sum of $25,000. The Giants were so well-fixed with Rogers Hornsby at second and Travis Jackson at short that it wasn't until 1928 that Andy broke in with the New Yorkers. In the meantime, he was his own best salesman by turning in a .353 batting mark at Buffalo and setting an all-time International League fielding record for second baseman.

Baseball fortunes took Cohen back to Newark in 1931 and then to Minneapolis. Cohen advanced rapidly as a manager from his first job at Pine Bluff to Dayton to Elmira, where, incidentally, he met his wife, Barbara. They now have two daughters and a son.

His baseball career was interrupted by World War II and he saw service in North Africa, Italy and Sicily.

Andy's post-war jobs came in this order: 1945-46, manager-owner, El Paso, Tex.; 1947, Bost Braves scout; 1948-49-50, manager, Eau Claire, Wis. With high recommendations from these positions, Andy took over the Denver Bears in 1950 from where he came to the Pelicans.

Cohen, dapper, humorous and down-to-earth, is much sought-after as an after-dinner speaker. He has talked baseball with numerous civic groups.

Baseball Men Praise

Hall Of Fame Selection

FPT 2/20/55

The selection of Andy Cohen as the first living member of El Paso's Athletic Hall of Fame has brought words of praise from top baseball men all over the country, Chris P. Fox, selection committee chairman, said Saturday.

Cohen will be presented a plaque at the first annual Gridiron Dinner at the Country Club Tuesday night.

Sponsored by the Press Club of El Paso and Southwestern Athletics Inc. Also honored will be the late but none the less the lives of which never Norman A. Ferguson Sr., famed El Paso tennis player of the '20's whose name will be here to accept the plaque in his behalf.

Cohen, the new manager of the New Orleans Pelicans of the Southern Association, will fly to El Paso from spring training headquarters.

Congratulatory remarks on Cohen's selection have been received by Fox from such stars of yesterday as Carl Hubbell, great pitcher with the New York Giants, Hubbell wired: "Congratulations in selecting Andy Cohen as the first member of your hall of fame. He was a member of the New York Giants when I joined that club in 1928. Besides being a fine player, his character has been a credit to the great game."

Charles A. Furth, president of the Southern Association, wrote: "Andy Cohen deserves the honor of only from the standpoint of what he has done and meant to baseball in El Paso, but also from a broader viewpoint on what he has meant to all baseball. We in the Southern were extremely proud to read of his selection, and also proud that he will continue his fine baseball career in our league this coming season."

Gabe Paul, vice-president and general manager of the Cincinnati Reds, wrote: "While Andy is to be congratulated of course, so are you and the members of your committee who selected such a fine athlete and fine gentleman. He is a credit to El Paso and a credit to the game of baseball."

Bob Howsam, general manager of the Denver Bears and Cohen's former boss, said: "Congratulations to you and the El Paso Hall of Fame for selecting Andy Cohen as the El Paso athlete to place in the Hall of Fame. As you no doubt know, Andy Cohen was manager of the Denver Bears Baseball Club for the last four years. During that time, he has won the enviable record of winning two pennants and losing one. All profits from the dinner, other two the last day of each season. Denver's loss this year will be a New Orleans' gain."

The Gridiron Dinner, at $25 per plate, will begin at 7 p. m. Each ticket entitles the bearer to the meal, refreshments, and dues in the Southwestern Athletics, Inc., for a year. All profits from the dinner, other two the last day of each season. Denver's loss this year will be a New Orleans' gain."

Also honored will be Coach Mike Brubelow of Texas Western College and his entire coaching staff. Men and women of the Press Club, representing El Paso news, radio and television stations, will present a half-hour program of humorous skits involving local personalities and public officials. Tickets can be purchased from the Gridiron Club members, or in the offices of the Hilton and Del Rio Hotels.

Gridiron Dinner Sees Local Figures Roasted On Griddle

All in fun, the evening's fiasco was El Paso's first Gridiron Dinner which packed in 474 people at $25 a plate for a stag affair in the County Club.

On the serious side, first nominees to El Paso's Athletic Hall of Fame were honored.

The first living member of the local hall of fame is Andy Cohen, who came by plane from Fort Myers, Fla., spring training camp of the Pittsburgh Pirates.

He received a plaque honoring him for his basketball and baseball playing accomplishments and his managerial record.

Cohen, former New York Giant great and a sandlot product of El Paso, is manager of the New Orleans Pelicans of the Southern Association.

Accepting a plaque in behalf of his father, the late Norman A. Ferguson Sr., was Lt. Col. N. A. Ferguson who flew here Tuesday from Alexandria, Va.

Mr. Ferguson was one of the Southwest's all-time great tennis players who knew his prime in the late 20s. He was considered the father of El Paso tennis and he was posthumously honored.

Ted Anderson of Southwestern Athletics, Inc., told the crowd that his organization was formed to encourage and foster athletics and sportsmanship in El Paso.

"Money netted here tonight will be used to enlarge the Sun Bowl, better Sun Bowl and a bigger and better TWC," he said.

John Phelan, president of the Press Club of El Paso, Inc., looked over the program and introduced Dr. Dyar Holcomb, president-elect of TWC.

After a short speech by Holcomb, the Press Club presented its "Harpoon and Lampoon Skits."

Members of the press, radio and television made light of just about every political figure and incident that made headlines during 1954-55. And a delegation from the Lower Valley stoned members of the City Council while the black-robed sister "Kungmakers" lurked in the background.

Frederick the First, King Michael and Hughey the Eighth and their consorts were presented and crowned, in various ways to carry on an alleged "political dynasty."

Funeral directors advertised their "convenient lay-away plan" and announced they gave double stamps on Wednesday.

A woman delegate, representing 10,000 women of El Paso and Juarez, caused the Council to abandon its plans for a $3 million proposed building because she wanted to preserve a historic landmark — alleged to be the finest architectural "monstrosity" in the Southwest.

THEME SONGS

Theme songs of mayoralty candidates were introduced, Mike Misenheimer will campaign with "Me and My Shadow." Dan Duke's theme will be "Just One More Chance."

After the skits, Chris P. Fox, chairman of the selection committee of El Paso Athletic Hall of Fame, explained the method of selection for candidates.

Hugh Steen, president of the Touchdown Club, also was introduced. He spoke briefly and turned the presentation of the Hall of Fame Plaques to Bob Ingram, El Paso Herald-Post sports editor.

Joe Rector Jr. presented a new home to Mike Brubelow, TWC athletic director. It was the gift of El Others participating were Lowell Stevenson, Peggy Stevenson, Joe Pulegnat, Paul Harris, J. E. Hynes, William Bridges, Elouise Phelan, and Hawley Richardson, and "Miss Press Box of 1955."

Other features were a menu which had chilled heart of credit manager, stuffed celery a la court-house columns, combination salad on duke, mashed traffic engineer, roast rump of kingmaker, pressed brains a la megovern, braised fillet of stuffed ballot box, breast pigeon a la marilyn, stewed peasant in misenheimer sauce, and roast can-yashback bracero.

Managers of minor league clubs affiliated with the Dodgers include many of the farm satellites of yesteryear, five of the farm pilots having played in the big show.

At Montreal (is Clyde Sukeforth, who highlighted his backstopping career as a catcher for the Cincinnati Reds and Brooklyn Dodgers. Bill Killefer, head man at Elmira, gained fame as the battery mate of Grover Alexander when "Old Alex" was making diamond history with the Phillies.

Larry Gilbert at Nashville, patrolled centerfield for the Boston Braves in their pennant-winning days. Milt Stock, the Macon manager, was a Flatbush hero for many years, when his bat was bringing runs across the plate for the Dodgers.

John McGraw's highly publicized Jewish find of several seasons back. Andy Cohen, still covers the second sack in expert fashion as playing manager of the Dayton Wings. He was a popular player with the Giants, but is now working overtime to develop future stars for their arch rivals.

Andy Cohen Made Manager of Pine Bluff Eighth-Placers

PINE BLUFF, Ark.—Ed Smith, business manager of the Pine Bluff club, signed Andy Cohen, former New York Giant, International League and American Association infielder, as manager of the Pine Bluff judges to succeed Jimmy Shevlin, who resigned on May 8.

Although he is a veteran, Cohen still is a capable player and plans to be an active performer with the Judges. He can play either short or second base.

Conen came to the judges from Minneapolis, where from time to time he managed the club when Donnie Bush, former pilot, was out with illness. He had been with Minneapolis for the last seven seasons and was given his release to permit him to come here.

Cohen is faced with a tough job in trying to haul the Pine Bluff team out of the Cotton States cellar. Under Shevlin, the Judges won only five of their first 15 games, and were riding a seven-game losing streak when Cohen signed.

Hornsby Successor on Giants Chosen Denver Pilot

By JOHN DREBINGER

Andy Cohen yesterday was named manager of the Yankees' Denver farm club. The 53-year-old Cohen succeeds Ralph Houk whom the Bombers recalled from the Denver post to serve as Yankee coach as a replacement for Bill Dickey. And therein lies an interesting story.

Though the connection with New York is rather remote, the enrollment of Cohen in the Yankee organization indirectly links Andy with the city with which he first gained fame, of sort, just thirty years ago.

Andy Cohen

the Cardinals for Rogers Hornsby, then at the height of his power as the game's greatest right-handed batsman. Hornsby also was a star second baseman.

Hornsby Traded Away

A year later the Giants made another startling trade. The team's stay at the Polo Grounds had not been a happy one and that winter, in a deal never satisfactorily explained, the great Hornsby went to the Chicago Cubs. The Giants acquired two players described in the press as "rather obscure"—Frank Hogan, a mastodontic pitcher, and Jimmy Welsh, an outfielder.

What was where Andy came from Purchased the year before in Waco by the Giants, the lucky farmer heavily misused when suddenly found himself thrust into a glaring spotlight. He was asked to take over at second base as a replacement for the Peerless Rajah. It was a large order for a kid then fifteen years old.

But Andy was a determined guy and he got off well. Perhaps, too well for his own good.

Early in May he was hitting around .350. Meanwhile, Hornsby, with the Braves, was excelling one of his infrequent slumps. His mark fell below .250.

To emphasize the surprising disparity an enterprising New York paper ran a daily box comparing "What the Rajah Did" with "What Our Andy Did." When Hornsby arrived in town he tuned, although his concern was not for himself, "That's a pretty shabby trick they're pulling on that kid," fumbled the outspoken Rapaah. "Sure, I'm not hitting. But you know it won't be long before I will and where will that leave him." Hornsby, of course, almost called that one to the decimal point.

Lack of Speed a Handicap

Andy, reeding after his early rupture, finished with a respectable, though hardly earth-shaking, .274 average. As for his fornsby, he merely took a seventh batting crown with a .357.

Andy did not survive long in the majors after that. Hand-in the big time. But he continued to play for many years in the minors, then took up managing with equal success. He piloted New Orleans, Memphis and countless other teams. Even now, in going to Denver, Andy returns for a beat he covered once before. From 1951 through 1954 Cohen managed Denver, then in the Western Association. He guided the Bears home to front in '52 and again in '54. In the other two years he finished runner-up. Last season he managed Indianapolis.

And now, after thirty years, Cohen finds himself linked once again with New York and with an assignment that could scarcely be any less formidable. In 1928 they asked him to fill the shoes of the noncomparable Hornsby as a second baseman. Taking over the Yankee farm in Denver he steps in behind Major Houk, who only last year drove the Bears to an American Association pennant and then beat Buffalo in the little world series.

Houk's Replacement Has to Aim High in New Post capped by shaky underpinning which were weakened by earlier career in basketball. Cohen could not overcome his slowness at foot for major league play. In fact, though he raised his average to .294 in 1929, that was his last year in the major league. Andy, however, did not quit. For the next 10 years he himself busy in the minors, tremendously popular figure wherever fortune took him. A player, he starred for many years in the International League and the American Association.

In fact, no sooner had the Giants shipped him off to Newark on option in 1930 than McGraw was of a mind to bring him back for another trial. But the day McGraw decided to do a little personal scouting, Andy tore a muscle in his leg. That was his last chance to get back in the big time.

OBITUARIES

Andy Cohen, who played two seasons at second base for the New York Giants in the late 1920s as successor to Rogers Hornsby, had a long career as a manager in the minors and later settled in his boyhood home of El Paso, where he was regarded as "Mr. Baseball" because of his involvement with University of Texas-El Paso teams and the city's minor league franchises, died in El Paso October 29 of complications from a stroke. He was 84.

Cohen's death came just four days after he had been inducted into the El Paso baseball hall of fame—on his birthday. He was the brother of the late Syd Cohen, a Washington Senators lefthander in the 1930s who was the last pitcher to strike out Babe Ruth in an American League game. Syd Cohen died in El Paso April 9 at the age of 81.

Andy Cohen was born in Baltimore and the family resettled in El Paso in his youth. He attended the University of Alabama and began his baseball career in 1925 at Waco. In 1926, the Giants purchased Cohen for $25,000, for delivery to New York in '27, but used him in 32 games in the infield in midsummer.

Cohen was sent down to Buffalo and was recalled early in 1928 when the Giants traded a disgruntled Hornsby, who had spent just one season in New York after his acquisition from the St. Louis Cardinals, to the Boston Braves for two undistinguished players.

Cohen suddenly found himself the Giants' starting second baseman. He played in 129 games in 1928, and 101 in '29, but was assigned to Newark in 1930. He was scheduled to be recalled, but suffered torn leg muscles and never made it back to the majors. His .281 average in 262 games for the Giants was his career figure.

Cohen took his first managerial job at Pine Bluff in 1939. He moved on to Dayton in 1940 and Elmira in '41, then spent three years in the Army, serving with a combat engineer battalion in North Africa, Sicily and Italy before returning to manage the El Paso club in 1945 and '46.

Later, he won two Western League pennants in four seasons as manager at Denver, and also piloted clubs in Eau Claire, New Orleans and Indianapolis. As a coach with the Philadelphia Phillies in 1960, Cohen managed the club for one game (a 5-4 victory over the Boston Braves) before Gene Mauch's arrival as successor to Eddie Sawyer, who had resigned.

Cohen's job as a sales representative for an El Paso beer distributorship enabled him to serve as a volunteer coach for El Paso's Texas League teams from 1960 to 1972. He also was responsible for the founding of the UTEP (then Texas Western) baseball program in 1960, and coached the Miners until his retirement in 1976.

Cohen was the first inductee when El Paso dedicated its athletic hall of fame in 1955, and a new downtown sports complex in the city was dedicated to the Cohen brothers last May.

Lad Who Came to Majors as Outfielder Earns Chance by Fine Playing as Substitute During 1928 Season.

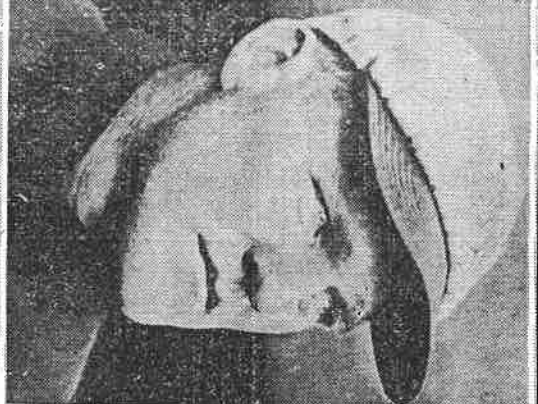

REGARDLESS of which way the battle goes, there will be a Handy Andy on second base for the New York Giants next season. If you would ask the 101-year-old of the team right now which one it will be, he could not tell you. Manager John McGraw could give no more satisfaction. It isn't known. But either Andy, Reese or Andy Cohen will fill the position for the Giants in their 1929 spring on the National League pennant. So it will be a fight between a Jewish boy and an "Irish-er."

It is breezed about that Reese has the inside track at this time because of the sensational manner in which he responded when called upon in the pinch last season. McGraw is mighty sweet on him. But that doesn't mean that Cohen has been a failure at the bag. He took over the job vacated by Rogers Hornsby last year and it was a tough spot in which to throw a kid.

Work Out Out for Cohen. And before Hornsby loomed the brilliant flash. And then back behind Fritch and his exploits about second base was the phantom memory of Larry Doyle.

Nothing daunted by the achievement of his predecessors, the young Jewish boy, playing his first year in the majors, buckled in and did his job. He hit .281 in 129 games, made 101 errors, batted well over 400 for average, and his hitting was most timely. He fielded well. If not grandly. But as the season passed, the mid-way mark, Cohen's batting fell off and his fielding was not so sure. And yet, all the way to the hectic finish, Cohen was a dangerous man at the bat. He was always liable to smash out a hit that would help. He was cool and calm and he gave every-

DEATH REMOVES

NOTABLES IN 1928

DEATH took its toll in the year of 1928 from the various ranks of baseball, including active and retired players, managers and umpires. Some of those who passed were well known to fans for their work well known to fans for their work. Others were snipped in the bushes they were on the threshold of making a name for themselves in baseball.

Among the better known who died during the last year were Hughie Jennings, former player and manager; Urban Shocker, famous spitball pitcher of the St. Louis Browns and New York Yankees; Frank Wilson, National League umpire; Joe Lannin and George Fogel, both well known as managers; Charles Ross, manager of the St. Louis Cardinals; best Warner and Bill Breitenbach, players of another day, and Dick Gifford and Clarence Allen, active players who were in the midst of their baseball careers.

thing he had to his club at all times through his period of play.

Reese, playing his second season with the Giants, had a remarkable record for a newcomer to fast company. He came to the club as an outfielder. He had been shifted to third base last year. He was a fast, aggressive, and aggressive boy. He was up-and-at-em. He is the ball center in his play. Handy Andy played the infield and the outfield in 1927 and last season he was tried at second base when Cohen's batting slump would not yield to treatment.

Reese's 1928 playing got excited about and his fielding was a mark made at that station in days gone by by Fritch, but his spirit, his attitude, his possibilities have endeared him to McGraw.

The master baseball man is sweet on Andy. He sees in him that type of which great players are made. He can hit, field and run. He has dash and courage. He is aggressive and ambitious. He takes care of himself and gives everything he has every day to McGraw.

Jewish Boy, However, Rates High with McGraw and Will Stick No Matter What May Happen in Spring.

McGraw, however, Reese from Memphis before that. He reported with confidence and was sent home. But he came back. He is 24 years old and was born in Tupelo, Miss. His batting average of .308 does not begin to designate his value to the team in the tough games and in the pinches. It is not expected that McGraw will let Andy Cohen go even if Reese comes up to the fondest expectations at second base. Cohen did not fail his mentor last season. He played in 129 games, batted .274. But Cohen has more than many men, who hit few balls under a hand that might well have crushed him from the start.

Has Good Years Ahead. He is a smart, clean-cut, earnest young player and is pretty sure to develop into a regular big leaguer. If not a great one.

His full name is Andrew Howard Cohen. He received three serious cuts in his leg last season. He was born in Baltimore in 1904. He moved to El Paso, Tex., when a year old. He played ball on a high school team in El Paso and signed a Galveston contract at the age of 16. Then he decided to go to the University of Alabama before enjoining in a baseball career, so he spent three years there and was a three letter man.

After his college days were over he played for the El Paso team with Waco, where he was a star. And was purchased by the Giant A.G. said on the choice of spending the 1927 season on the Giant bench or being farmed to Buffalo. He chose the latter and played Fritch in the International League. He is quite some lad in Cohen. And so is Reese.

El Paso Athletes Will Return To Baseball World In Spring.

By JOHNNY WARD

SHADOWS were lengthening in Rio Grande Ball Park as the sun, winking back from a myriad of window panes in the neighborhood, neared the end of its westward swing on that hot summer afternoon in 1917.

The ball park, then in the 2200 block of Wyoming Street, was deserted. But on the vacant lot across the street, had gathered hundreds of El Pasoans. They were watching a short, heavy-set youngster rifle them squarely over homeplate as the game went into its 15th inning. The score was tied 3-3.

"That makes the 17th batter that kid has fanned," a bystander mused. "Wonder what his name is . . ."

"It ain't th 17th man he's fanned—it's th 18th," said a small, dark complexioned youngster indignantly. "And he's my brother, Andy—the best pitcher in the world."

It was little Sydney Cohen, himself a sandlotter in El Paso's Boyland League. As he started to tell the stranger about his brother, a sharp single cracked out over second base and attracted their attention back to the game.

Andy Cohen, on the mound for the Mercers, was a one-man team that day—but the Mercers lost the game to the Monogram Kids in the 17th inning. Andy fanned 19 batters, allowed 11 hits and plastered six hits out of eight trips to the bat. Opposing him in the box was Ray McCracken, lanky eastside youngster who allowed 13 hits and fanned 12 men.

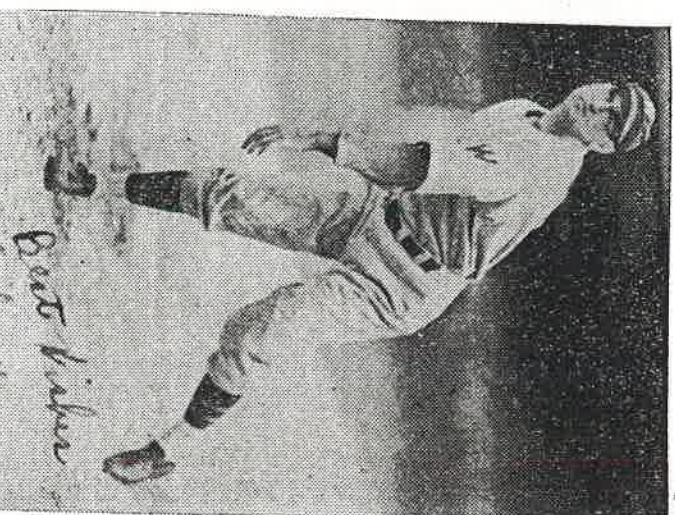

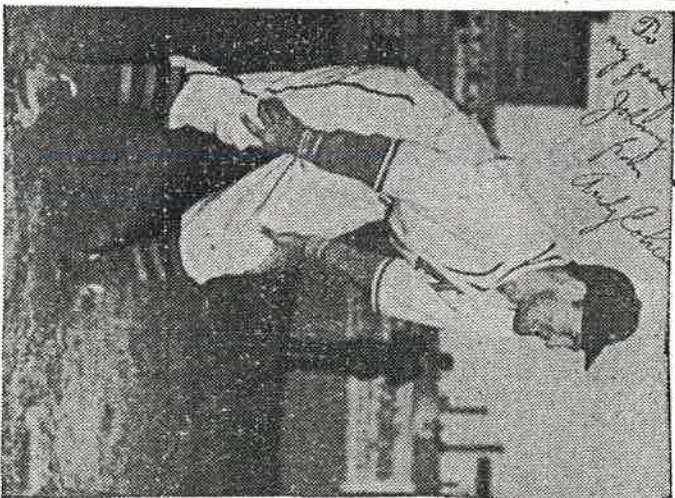

"I'll never forget that game," Andy Cohen said Sunday, beaming over an old clipping from the El Paso Herald as Sydney, standing nearby, also recalled their early sandlot experiences.

Andy and Syd Cohen, two of the finest baseball players ever produced in El Paso, both have had their fling at the "big time" in the major leagues. To persons who have known the two Jewish athletes through grammar and high school, on the diamond and basketball court, they also are conspicuous in the city's list of "regular guys."

HOME for their annual winter visit with their mother, Mrs. L. Cohen, 1215 North Stanton Street, the Cohens soon will return to the world of baseball—Andy back to Minneapolis where he is assistant manager and regular second baseman, Syd to the Baltimore Orioles to whom he was sold for $50,000 by the Washington Senators.

Their long treks upward from El Paso's sandlots to the majors have been similar, except that Andy's major league career with the New York Giants was a brilliant one filled with praises by sports writers throughout the East, banquets and speeches by big wig politicians. Syd's career with the Washington Senators of the American League has been a short one, but his record probably will see him back in the "big time" after a season with the Orioles this year.

Andy and Syd were born in Baltimore. They came to El Paso as youngsters, Syd, six, and Andy, nine. They graduated from Ala-

Visa School, where they had get a pilotship of some club in the near future.

El Paso High School. Andy was a three-sport man, lettering in football, basketball and baseball and excelling in each. Syd won letters in baseball and basketball. Andy graduated in 1922, going to Alabama University for three years. Syd followed him to Bama in 1923, after graduating from E.P.H.S. and attending Southern Methodist University for a year.

THEN their paths separated. To the Waco club, with whom he had signed before his graduation from high school, went Andy Cohen—the most promising college baseball player of the year. He played for three months during the 1925 season, then was sold to the New York Giants for $25,000. His first professional baseball game had been played against San Antonio on May 31, 1925.

When he was sold to the Giants, Andy's ambition was fulfilled. He always had idolized John McGraw. Today the memory of the benevolent Giant manager is dear to the heart of the bronzed El Paso athlete.

Andy reported to McGraw in the spring of 1926, employed a training session with the Giants and then was farmed out to Buffalo in 1927. During the next two years he was regular second baseman for the Giants, and hailed as one of the greatest infielders in the National League. But baseball politics intervened and Andy was sent to Newark in the International League.

It was in Newark in 1931 that Andy established an all-time fielding record, accepting 312 consecutive chances in 59 straight games without an error. The previous record was 237 chances without an error. Despite his showing, he was traded to Minneapolis where he has remained since. During the illness of Manager Donie Bush last season, Andy managed the club and many mid-Western observers predict he'll

After a season in Mexico, he returned to El Paso and played under Manager Mule Washburn in the Arizona-Texas League until the depression killed it in 1932. Going then to Portland, Ore., he played a season in the Northwest and, in 1934, joined Andy at Minneapolis where he played two months.

Syd then signed with Chattanooga in the Southern League and, after playing most of the '34 season, went to the Senators to close the last two weeks of the season. It was during these two weeks that Syd was the last pitcher to strike out Babe Ruth in the King of Swats last American League season.

"Yeh, and Ruth hit his last American League home run off me," Syd recalled, reflectively scratching his head as Andy kidded him about the ease with which Ruth had lifted the ball over the center field fence.

But most of the Yankee big guns fanned miserably against the left-handed El Pasoan's speed ball. Syd fanned Lou Gehrig five times out of the seven that Gehrig faced him. "I had less trouble with Gehrig than with any of them," he said. "Joe Di Maggio? He just got two hits off me last year—but," Syd's expression changed, "one of them was a homer—the longest hit I've ever seen."

They sent Syd back to Chattanooga in 1935. He won 16 games so they took him back to Washington for the '36 and '37 seasons.

THE Cohens agreed that El Paso was more baseball minded than when they were youngsters than it is now. Besides the Boyland League, there was baseball at El Paso High School and in the City League. Those were the days of the old Copper League, in which Syd and Andy played with Hurley, N. M., in 1924. Prior to their Copper League days, Syd played with the old Garden Grocers—Butch Biedsoe's team—and later with George Simpson's Babe Ruth Club in the City League.

"Butch Biedsoe gave me the first baseball glove I ever owned," Syd said. He disappeared into a back room of the apartment and emerged with a tiny, lefthander's fielding mitt. "Look," he said proudly, "I wrote my name on every finger. Boy, I sure was proud of this glove—and still am. Butch and George Simpson always had a lot of faith in me as a ball player."

Tony Carvajal was the catcher for the Garden Grocers. Syd said Tony would have made a major league backstop if he hadn't lost his leg in an accident. Other crackjack sandlotters in those days were Manny Ponsford, Ducky Gowan, Al Adkins, Blocky Fuller, Art Weiss, Sammy Dwyer, Red and Dick Carberry, Brice Schuller, Goodwin Ragsdale, Leroy Schuller, Sammy and Charlie McKerny, Jodie McCormick, "Doeey" Dawson and Frank and Bishop Patterson—to mention a few.

Bob Osborn, McCormick, Eddie Crozier and a few others, besides the Cohen brothers, have been up in the "big time"—but Andy and Syd, still playing bang-up baseball, are probably the only ones who will be up there again.

Baltimore, Md., October 25, 1904. Home-El Paso, Tex. Bats-R Throws-R Ht.-5'9" Wt.-175 Married; three children. Graduated El Paso High, 1922; played baseball, basketball, football. Attended University of Alabama for three years; played varsity baseball, basketball and football; captained baseball team his final year. Is sales representative for a brewery. Hobbies-bridge, reading, watching television.
Made major league debut with New York Giants in 1926 as pinch-hitter for the great Frank Frisch, singling on the first pitch. Greatest playing thrill was opening day, 1928, when, replacing the immortal Rogers Hornsby as Giants' second baseman, he drove in two runs and scored two others to lead New York to a 5-2 win over Boston. In 1931 set International League record for best fielding average by a second baseman (.985). Led American Association second baseman in fielding in 1933, 1937-38. Served in U. S. Army (Engineers) for 2½ years in World War II, participated in invasions of North Africa and Italy. Was major league manager for one game-which he won: In 1960 was coach for Philadelphia when Eddie Sawyer resigned as manager after first game of season; Cohen manager Phils for one game, the home opener, until Gene Mauch arrived. In 1966 was selected All-Time All-star shortstop for Buffalo, International League. Younger brother, Sydney, pitched and managed for 25 years, was with Washington, 1934-37.

Out of Left Field . . . It Took 32 Years, But Andy Is Back

If you were a Giant fan in the 1920's, you'll remember Andy Cohen. Or if you came along later, you read Frank Graham's history of the Giants or some of the reminiscing sports columns. Somewhere, inevitably, you came across the story of Andy Cohen and Rogers Hornsby.

How John McGraw traded the great Hornsby in 1928 and brought up 22-year-old Andy Cohen to replace him. How Cohen was New York's first Jewish ball player and how the Jewish people fussed over him. How Hornsby got off to a bad start with Boston, while Cohen was leading the league. How the "Graphic" published a daily comparative box score of Hornsby's and Cohen's batting averages. How Hornsby said, "You people are being unfair to the kid. I'm not hitting now, but when I do, I'll leave him in the dust." And how the great Hornsby did what he said he would do.

Andy Cohen

It's part of the history of the 1920's, along with Jack Dempsey and Babe Ruth and Lindbergh and Leopold-Loeb and P. Scott Fitzgerald and all the other storied figures they cite when they are waxing sentimental over that over-sentimentalized decade.

Now after 31 years, Cohen is back in the big leagues as a coach with the Phillies. "Yes, it was all true," he says. "I got off to that good start in 1928 and they kept a box score. The thing people forget is that Hornsby not only left me in the dust, but passed everybody else. He hit .387 that year. I hit a respectable .274."

Cohen said it was true about the way he was lionized by the Jewish people of New York. They were predominantly of the economic lower class and in need of a baseball hero. They flocked to see McGraw's sensational new player just as the Negro people later flocked to see Jackie Robinson. Many of them wine'd and dine'd this poisonous young man from El Paso. A man who knew him when says, "He could have had anything he wanted. Some of those garment-center barons couldn't do enough for him. They threw their daughters at him. Don't think some of them didn't offer him big money—$100,000—to marry their daughters."

In 1929, Cohen hit .294, but McGraw thought he was too slow around second base. McGraw pinned a "toothball legs" rap on him and sent him to Newark, where the robes-to-rags angle followed the dreary script. "In the two years I was at Newark," Cohen said, "none of the people who fussed over me at New York came over to see me."

He had one chance to return to the big leagues, but he broke his ankle on the day in 1931 that McGraw came over to bring him back from Newark. He went to Minneapolis for seven years, hitting over .300 most of the time, then began a career as minor-league manager that has taken him all over the land. The amazing part of the story is that he never received any offer to come back, though he was always willing and able.

Andy is still puzzled that he never got another chance through all those good years at Minneapolis. It is indeed a puzzle. A man checking back deduces that the "bad legs" rap was circulated like a bad penny, almost as though bad words drive out the good. People who never saw him talk as though he were some kind of cripple. He was slow, but not that slow. After a while there was a tendency to think of him as too old. So he never got the chance.

He beat the bushes as a manager, too. When he was let out at Denver after the 1958 season, he was resigned that he would never make it back in El Paso, where he is a renowned figure, the first living man voted into the El Paso Sports Hall of Fame. Then the call came last winter from an old employer, Philadelphia general manager John Quinn, who had checked and found that "everybody had a good word for Andy Cohen."

Now, at 54, he is back, a down-to-the-end cigar smoker, rich with the years in the minors, with jet-black, pistachio-hair, a prominent nose that was broken five times "in three sports," on a cheery, red face. He looks like a man who sings bases in a barber-shop quartet. He walks out to the coaches' box with a big-in-the-belly shuffle, not unlike Charlie Chaplin walks, only slower. It is the sero-comic locomotion of a manager giving dignity and pomp to his movements on the diamond. It is the walk of 20 years of managing in the minors.

And now he sits back, puffs on the cigar and says, "This is where everyone wants to be. No one wants to put on that uniform tomorrow more than I do. Thirty years is a long time to get stuck in the minors."

And he tells stories: of the time at Pine Bluff, Ark., where his team had to push a rickety bus 300 yards to Mississippi river ferry; of the time he roomed with Johnny Mack Brown while playing football for Alabama; of the fact that he was the first man drafted off the Elmita team into the Army in 1942, though he was 36, the oldest man on the club. (He never did accept those mutual offers when he was the toast of New York. He married much later and now has three young children.)

And he says, "I am the kind of a guy who always has a shirt that is too clean to send to the laundry, but not clean enough to wear to a nice affair."

Mrs. Lena D. Cohen

Mrs. Lena D. Cohen, the mother of two former major leaguers, died in a hospital in El Paso, Tex., February 13, following an illness of several weeks. She was 73.

One of her sons, Andy, was an infielder with the Giants in the 1920's. The other, Syd, later pitched for the Senators. Both became minor league managers and Andy is now a vice-president and coach of El Paso (Texas).

Other survivors include a daughter, Mrs. J. N. Remnikov, three sisters and six grandchildren. 3-2-46/3

Pilots Angels' Farm

Los Angeles, Dec. 16 (UPI)—Angels' general manager, Fred Haney today announced the firing of coach of the Angels (Cohen) as A.A. El Paso, Tex., farm club. Cohen broke into major league baseball as an infielder with the New York Giants in 1927. He served as a minor league manager for 17 years and coached for the Phillies in 1959.

The Cohen brothers, Andy and Sid, have joined El Paso as instructional coaches. The two former major leaguers are residents of El Paso and Andy just recently retired from coaching at the University of Texas-El Paso. Andy, a former infielder with the Giants, will do some coaching at first base and also instruct in hitting and fielding. Sid, a former pitcher for the Senators, will work with the hurters in the bullpen.

CLEARWATER, Fla.—There is a look of pugnacious combat and hard-knock wisdom on Andy Cohen's friendly face. The hairline retreats with dignity. The jaw is set firmly. And Cyrano himself would be proud of that majestically athletic nose. ("And when it bleeds—the Red Sea.")

A rookie coach with the Phillies, Cohen was saying yesterday that in all his 35 years in baseball nothing really unusual had happened to him. A truth-seeker blanched.

"That in itself would be unusual," he said, "but your putty nose seems to betray you."

Cohen removed two inches of cigar and one inch of ash from his lips and swilled his cheeks with a cheer. "Broke it five times," he said. "In three sports."

"You must have worked at it."

"Well, I went to the University of Alabama, and I played football, basketball and baseball. I was a halfback in football—roomed three years with Johnny Mack Brown. Broke my nose against Florida. I was a guard in basketball. Broke it going up for a rebound . . . against Georgia Tech, I think. I used to shoot a one-hand shot every once in a while but the coach would get on me; you had to shoot two-handed in those days."

"And in baseball?"

"That happened years later," he said. "Don't even remember where the first time. I was playing second base and we had this catcher with a real strong, wild arm. He'd throw the ball 15 feet over you or to either side of you, but never right at you. This time I tripped covering the bag on a steal and lost my balance. He threw it right on the bag—and into my nose."

A Hustler and a Battler

Maybe it was at Pine Bluff, Ark., where Cohen managed his first club and where he and his tyros had to push a rickety bus 30 yards to a Mississippi River ferry. Or at Minneapolis or Eau Claire, Wis. Cohen managed in every classification and played in many of them.

"I was a hustler and a battler, all right," he said. "You had to hustle to play for McGraw."

Hustle, indeed. Cohen had to beat out Frankie Frisch and Roger Hornsby to make the Giants.

"I always say that," he said, grinning, "because it makes it sound pretty tough. Actually, I had my first shot in '26 when Frisch was there. They sent me back, and in '27 the Giants got Hornsby for Frisch. Next year they traded Hornsby and I became the regular second baseman."

He became more than that.

"I was the Jewish Jackie Robinson," Cohen said. "There had been one to make it with a top team—and in New York. With a name like Cohen, such headlines."

Cohen admired John McGraw for his inventiveness and the discipline he maintained. He had just two seasons to admire him, though.

Cohen admired John McGraw for his inventiveness and the discipline he maintained. He had just two seasons to admire him, though.

"I hit .274 and .294—you never forget your average," he said, "but Mac got down on me one day because he said I had 'football legs.' It was in Cincinnati. I hit a soft liner over second that I thought was a sure hit. I had hurt my leg and didn't want to tell Mac because I wanted to stay in the lineup. I thought I could take it easy down the line but Hughie Critz came up with the ball and threw me out. Mac was off me for good. Funny thing: Critz became the next Giant second baseman."

In the winter of '29 Cohen was traded to Newark for screwballer Lefty Prewett, who had earned a measure of fame by striking out Babe Ruth 13 straight times with the Browns. Cohen hit over 300 in seven of nine years in AAA ball—and never gravitated back to the majors. Instead, he drifted from one minor league berg to another in the familiar pattern. Then in 1958 he quit and went into public relations work at his home in El Paso, Tex.

General Manager John Quinn, Cohen's boss in the Braves organization, hired him back into baseball after the '59 season.

"This is where everyone wants to be," 54-year-old Andy Cohen said, gesturing with a wave to the ground-keepers manuevering the infield behind him. "No one wants to put on that uniform tomorrow more than me. Thirty years is a long time between stops. It took me thirty years to get back to the majors. I guess that's the only unusual thing that ever happened to me."

EL PASO — ~~There's~~ a special reason why Andy Cohen, veteran baseball coach at Texas El Paso, has a "thing" against beanballs.

Cohen at one time was a roommate of Carl Mays when both played in the major leagues. Mays once threw a pitch that hit Ray Chapman of the Cleveland Indians in the head. And as all good baseball fans can recall, Mays died. His death is believed to be the only one in history caused by a pitched ball.

'He was having a nightmare and kept yelling, 'I didn't do it! I didn't do it!'

"I remember once, in the middle of the night while we were sleeping, Mays started yelling in his sleep. He was having a nightmare and kept yelling, 'I didn't do it! I didn't do it!' Cohen recalled.

Some people speculated that Mays may have purposely thrown the ball at Chapman. But Cohen was convinced that it was an accident.

"It was something that Carl carried inside of him throughout his life. Watching this happen to a player was a sad experience.

"This has stayed with me down through the years. And this is why I never order a pitcher to purposely hit a batter."

Cohen, who has been involved in baseball as a player, manager or coach for more than 60 years, is regarded as one of the nice guys in the business.

Cohen played for the New York

'Rube would stop the game if a fire engine would pass by and he's been known to even go to the fire'

Giants in 1926, 1928 and 1929 as a second baseman. He managed the Philadelphia Phils briefly in 1960 and served as a minor league manager for 18 years before becoming coach of Texas-El Paso 16 years ago.

Cohen remembered a lot of "flakey" players in professional baseball.

Some of these included Lefty Gomez, who was "flakey as a fox."

Rube Walker and Umpire Jocko Conlan, to name a few.

"Lefty Gomez always stepped off the mound when a plane was going over, so he wouldn't miss anything.

Rube would stop the game if a fire engine would pass by. . . and he's been known to even go to the fire and make a stop at a nearby bar at the same time. Jocko Conlan was the only umpire who ever tossed me out of a game."

Cohen remembers one particular day when he was a rookie with the Giants.

"We were playing against Pittsburgh, a team that included the famous Waner twins, Paul and Lloyd (both inducted into the Hall of Fame).

"One of the Waners got on first base and I thought to myself that if we could double these guys up, that would be a feather in my cap.

"The Waner batting hit a three hopper directly to me at second base, and I had dreams of cutting them both down -- except I forgot there were two outs.

"So when I tossed the ball to shortstop Travis Jackson, who thought I would throw to first for the final out, he saw the ball coming out of the corner of his eye and instinctively ducked. The ball

'It was so bad that he started to cry when he came into the dugout' went all the way out to the wall in the left field foul area and both runners scored.

"When I got back to the dugout, Manager John McGraw said to me: 'Young man -- you're not in the Texas League anymore. You don't make a double play with two outs.'"

Unusual situations can happen on the college front, also, Cohen said.

"Not too many years ago, one of our players was really getting harassed by the Arizona State fans in a game at Tempe. It was so bad, he started to cry when he came into the dugout.

"The next day I told him to put cotton in his ears. After the first inning was over, I asked him how it worked. With cotton still stuffed in his ears, he remarked: 'It worked fine, coach -- I didn't hear a thing!'"

Cohen went to the Giants in 1926 in a deal that saw Waco of the Texas League get $25,000 and two players for Andy. Cohen played in the majors until 1929, played some minor league ball before eventually becoming a minor league manager, and a college coach.

One of his greatest moments came during a convention of the American Assn. of College Baseball Coaches in Chicago. Chuck Tanner, then manager of the White Sox, was speaking to a large crowd of college coaches during a clinic. He noticed Andy Cohen walk into the door to the auditorium.

"I'd like to interrupt this clinic for a moment," Tanner said. "I just saw Andy Cohen walk in. Andy. . . come on up here. Here is a guy who was my manager in the minors and he is one of the greatest men I've ever known."

'Baseball is the only sport where money is paid for hidden talent'

Cohen, like many oldtimers (Cohen will be 74 years of age this October) believes that the major leagues face ruin with the present high salaries that are being paid to many superstars.

"Baseball is the only sport where money is paid for hidden talent. No player is worth a million dollars for three years of baseball. You must remember that a lot of people are making maybe $75 or $100 a week. I don't think this is good for baseball at all."

Despite being out of the major leagues as an active player for many years, Cohen still receives "about 8 or 10" requests a week for photos and autographs from collectors.

Cohen has one fond memory of his major league days. When Mel Ott reported to the New York Giants in 1926 as a 16-year-old

'Oh yes, back home when I was a kid' phenom, someone asked him if he ever played the outfield.

"Oh yes. . . back home when I was a kid," Ott replied.

The personable, Cohen started his baseball career in El Paso, attended the University of Alabama where he was an outstanding football player in addition to baseball and in 1925 he signed a pro contract with Waco. . . and has been active in the game ever since.

was not large enough to accommodate all his players and the pile of newspapers and telegrams he had collected. Friends sent their congratulations from all over the country, and Andy was as busy as John D. Rockefeller shelling out dimes to bell hops. By this time every one knows how Andy Cohen broke up the opening game of the season at the Polo Grounds on Wednesday. To Andy, a young Jewish boy playing his first major league game as a regular and tied with the task of convincing several hundred thousand Jewish-American boys that the place of Robert Kennedy on the New York Giants, it was this thrill that comes once in a life time:

"But I tried not to show it," McGraw helped. He called me over before the game and said: 'Remember, kid, it's just another ball game!' Hornsby was mighty nice. As a fellow Texan, he gave me some good advice. 'You may be puzzled,' he said, 'Don't pay any attention to him. Keep your head up and keep hustling.'

Surprised by Fans Demonstration
"But," he went on, "I never dreamed of anything like the demonstration after the game."

Gohan is not the only one who never dreamed of such a demonstration. It is rare, indeed, for the fans to swoop down upon a professional baseball player to carry him triumphantly on their shoulders of the field.

"I was worried," said Cohen. "They were tramping over the kids. One boy had his shoulder broken."

Andy was frankly happy over the way he had broken into New York. "It means a lot to me," he said. "It is the greatest thing in life—the new friend."

De Woldia de Bredius medicus.

"I said, 'But I don't know. If you haven't got your heart in it, it's no good. You're just wasting your time.' My brother, Sid, studied medicine for two years and then gave it up. He's out in the Pacific Coast League, now pitching. You remember he made the last Western trip with the Giants last year."

Hopes to Return to College

Andy is stout and stocky, with dark hair and brown face and eyes. He talks quickly and confidently and knows his own mind. He either answers a question or says he does not want to. It is a pleasure to talk to him. Some day he intends going back to the University of Alabama to take his B. A. degree.

He was born in Alabama, but was born neither in Texas nor in Alabama. He was born in Baltimore, October 25, 1904. When he was about a year old, 1904. When he was about a year old, his parents moved to Norfolk, Va., lived there a little while and moved to Springfield, Ill., where he grew up. He was a very bright boy and went to school and made his home with his mother, Mrs. Cass Cohen.

He not only played on all the teams, but he was good at all of them. He was rated as the best basketball player in Texas. His high school team won Texas state championship and Andy was nominated as one of the forwards on the all-Texas team.

"Doc Gurnat, a well known physician in El Paso, and Harry Karp, a Texas League umpire, recommended me. I signed, but I had no ideas about playing professional ball then. I was still in school."

About the same time a University of Alabama officer Andy an athletic scholarship. So, when he was graduated from high school he went there. He stayed all night having signed to play for the Alabama team. Meanwhile, the Galveston firmishes and the Galveston to Waco, and Andy went with them. He became the property of the Waco Club, where Del Pratt was manager. Del also is a University of Alabama man. The Waco Club began to send Andy notices He ignored them to report and pay notices He ignored them to report and pay notices He ignored them to report and pay notices He replied that he would not. Sometimes he had finished his education.

The freshman rule went into effect the year Andy entered the University of Alabama, which was in September, 1932, so he had to play on the freshman team. Next year he played on the varsity. He played nearly every position on the team. Next year he settled with the Giants toward the end of the 1936 season. The most memorable thing he did was go from his third while Traynor was throwing out somebody at first.

He reported for spring training at Saratoga in 1937. No great fuss was made over him. The Giants had just got Hornsby and there was not much chance of Cohen ever getting anywhere. McGraw called him over one day. The situation was plain to both. They did not have to discuss it.

do, all the while you're out there, sitting on the bench with your arms crossed, waiting for your chance to come in and play ball regularly with Buffalo?"

Andy picked Buffalo. "He went up there with Bill Clymmer and played in 180 ball games. They started him at second, but shifted him to short. He scored ninety-three runs, made 196 hits of which fourteen were homers, thirty-four doubles, and five triples, and ended the season with a batting average of .353. He also led the International League in strikeouts in 1907. And Buffalo won the pennant, didn't he?"

Then came the Hornsby deal that stunned the baseball public from coast to coast. The Giants had traded Rogers Hornsby, the greatest batsman in the National League, for Frank Hoagan and Jim Weiland!

The question immediately arose: Who is going to take Hornsby's place? And the answer was: Andy Cohen. The Giants said had an option on him. People laughed derisively at the very idea. No one could take Hornsby's place.

for their aping of the British and Cohen reported on day with me and his trip in one hand and a Hombry bar in the other. He said hello to McGraw and settled down to the heroic task of putting second base for the Giants.

His philosophy was simple: "It is not as if Hombry were still with the team and I was substituting for him," he said. "He is not here. Somebody has to play second base. It might as well be me."

So they came north with the club and scored a personal victory, the like of which has seldom, if ever, been seen in baseball.

"Now," says Andy, "it's up to me to make good."

Billiard Results

Charles Harmon defeated Thomas Mack in a pocket billiard match at Dwyer's Grand Street Academy yesterday afternoon, 75 to 15, in nine innings. Harmon had a high run of 21 and Mack 5.

James Mathew, meeting all corners at Lawler's Brooklyn rooms, defeated Ed Clarke, 100 to 28, in a pocket billiard exhibition. Mathew ran out in the nineteenth inning, scoring a high run of 23 to Clarke's 12. In the sixth annual Captain Smith memorial three-cushion tournament, Robert Blair defeated Robert Cole, 25 to 16, with high runs of 4 and 2, respectively.

Although losing the evening block after winning in the afternoon, Andrew St. Jean widened his lead over Onofrio Landi in their pocket billiard match at the Fourteenth Street Academy yesterday. St. Jean won in the Andy was frankly happy over the way he had broken into New York. "It means a lot to me," he said. "To me, it is the greatest thing in life—being in the greatest place in the world. Andy is only twenty-three years old. If he had been temperamentally inclined to carry out his mother's wishes, he would be studying medicine.

"She wanted me to be a doctor," he said. "But I don't know. If you haven't got your heart in it, it's no good. You're just wasting your time. My brother, Sid, studied medicine for two years and then gave it up. He's now in the Pacific Coast League, now pitching for the Yankees. He made the last Western trip with the Giants last year."

Hopes to Return to College

Andy is stout and stocky, with dark hair, brown eyes and nose. He talks quickly and candidly and has this opinion on the subject of his own education or says he does not want to. It's a pleasure to talk to him. Some day he intends going back to the University of Alabama to take his B. A. degree. Country to popular belief, Andy was born neither in Texas nor in Alabama. He was born in Baltimore, October 25, 1903. When he was about a year old, his parents moved to Norfolk, Va., lived there a little while and moved on, finally to El Paso, Tex. Here Andy grew up and went to school, and where he makes his home with his mother, Mrs. Lee Cohen.

Andy went to grammar school in El Paso and then to Texas High School. He said, "I was always athletic. I played on all the teams, football, baseball, basketball."

He not only played on all the teams, but he was good at all of them. He was rated as the best basketball player in Texas. His high school team won the state championship and Andy was named as one of the forwards on the all-Texas team.

He was still in high school when he was signed by the Galveston Baseball Club. He was sixteen years old when he entered his name to his first baseball contract.

Offered an Athletic Scholarship

"Doc Gamrat, a well known Physican in El Paso, and Harry Kahn, Texas League umpire, recommended me. I signed, but I had no clear ideas about playing professional ball then. I was still in school."

About the same time the University of Alabama offered Andy an athletic scholarship. So, when he was graduated from high school he went there. He forgot all about having signed to play ball for Galveston. Meanwhile the Galveston franchise had been assigned to Waco, and Andy went with it and became the property of the Waco Club, where Del Pratt was manager. Del also is a University of Alabama man. The Waco Club began to send Andy notices requesting him to report and play ball. He replied that he would as soon as he had finished his education.

The freshman rule went into effect the year Andy entered the University of Alabama, which was in September, 1922, so he had to play on the freshman team. Next year he played on the varsity. He played nearly every position on the team. Next year he settled down at short, playing third base with him at first, and Del Pratt was now up with the Senators. This team won the Southern Conference championship. And Andy Cohen was elected captain of the 1928 baseball team. It was the first time in the history of the university that a Jew had been elected captain of anything. But Andy never explained a team for Alabama. He did not return next year.

Played Football and Basketball, Too

He had played baseball, basketball and football for them, and was one of their outstanding athletes. But the Waco Club was becoming impatient. Andy decided he could not put it off any longer, so he left college in May and reported to the Waco Club on June 1, 1923.

While still in school he had played during his vacations for the Cleveland Rosenblyums and in the Copper League. Baseball was becoming his main object in life. Also, while attending the University of Alabama, scouts representing the St. Louis Browns and the Chicago Cubs had approached him, only to characterize him as "too good only to shatter his own hopes."

He played ball for Waco in 1923 with such style and speed that the Giants bought him at the end of the season for a price reported unofficially as $25,000. The Giants also gave Walter Novak, an infielder, for him.

Andy was not supposed to report to the Giants until 1927, but the infield was short in 1926 and toward the end of the season he was hastily summoned. He reported to the team in Philadelphia, and I remember well how we walked around him the first night and asked questions at him. He was just a recruit, another experimental Jewish ball player. But one thing stands out in recollecting that interview. Andy was one of the brightest recruits we had ever interviewed.

Played With Giants in 1926

At the end of the interview one of the reporters said: "That young man may or may not be a good ball player, but I'll say this for him: he can think."

Andy got into three or four games with the Giants toward the end of the 1926 season. The most memorable thing he did was go from first third while Traynor was throwing out somebody at first.

He reported for spring training at Saratoga in 1927. No great fuss was made over him. The Giants had just got Hornsby and there was no much chance of Cohen ever getting any place in the lineup. He was called into one day. The situation was plain to both. They did not have to discuss it.

Mac said: "Which would you rather do, sit on the bench all year or play ball regularly with Buffalo?"

Andy picked Buffalo.

He went up there with Bill Ciganer and played in 150 ball games. They started him at second, but shifted him to short. He scored ninety-three runs, made 196 hits of which fourteen were homers, thirty-four doubles, and five triples, and ended the season with a batting average of .353. He also led the International League in home runs in fielding. And Buffalo won the pennant.

Cohen is sequel to Hornsby Deal

Then came the Hornsby deal that stunned the baseball public from coast to coast. The club had traded Roger Hornsby, the greatest batsman in the National League, for Frank Hogan and Jim Welsh.

The question immediately arose: Who is going to take Hornsby's place? And the answer was: Andy Cohen. The Giants will had an option on him. People laughed derisively at his very idea. No one could take Hornsby's place.

But the Giants went to Augusta for their spring training and Cohen reported one day with his grip in one hand and a Hornsby bat in the other. He said hello to McGraw and settled down to the heroic task of playing second base for the Giants.

His philosophy was simple: "It is not as if Hornsby were still with the team," he said. "He is not here. Somebody has to play second base. It might as well be me."

So Andy came north with the club and scored a personal victory, the like of which has seldom, if ever, been seen in baseball.
