

Cohen's Father Was Amateur Baseball Star in Baltimore

Andy's Parent Just Missed Making Grade in Majors.
Junior Player Started in Game Early.

By ALFRED H. COHEN.

Special to the BUFFALO EVENING NEWS.

BALTIMORE, Md., April 22.—Andy Cohen inherits his baseball ability from his father. This fact was disclosed in an interview with the elder Cohen here. Andy's parent is a resident of Baltimore. He conducts a grocery store here.

The father was elated over his son's baseball success. He has reason for this. Andy has followed in his father's footsteps and has made the grade.

The elder Mr. Cohen, a gentleman of 48 years, once cavorted upon the baseball diamonds himself. He was a star amateur in his day, playing with the Baltimore Israelites and the Baltimore West Ends. Shortstop was his chosen post although he also donned the mask and protector quite frequently.

Came a time when Andy's father reached stardom. He was given a trial with the Baltimore professional baseball team but just missed the grade. The late Hughey Jennings was manager of the club then. It is more than a score of years ago. Needless to say, Manus Cohen was sadly disappointed.

However, today that disappointment is no longer a heartache. It has turned to glee through the success of his boy Andy. Manus Cohen disclosed some of Andy's traits in his boyhood days. He observed that Andy was always a gentleman and was possessed of a captivating personality. Andy was the real boyish type as a child. He took to athletics early and fancied baseball the best.

The now famous baseball player owned his first baseball glove when he reached the age of five.

The elder Cohen recalled Andy as a very studious chap in his school-days. He was an obedient fellow and always followed the advice of his parents. He listened to the counsel of others, but always did his own thinking.

Andy's mother moved to El Paso for her health. Business pressure kept his father in Baltimore and Andy stayed here for a short time. His brother Sidney and sister Eva accompanied Mrs. Cohen to the warmer climate. Lonesomeness brought Andy to the home of his mother a short time afterward.

Andy was born in Baltimore, his father declared, just opposite Carroll park. The family moved from here to Norfolk, Va., when he was three years old and then to El Paso.

Individual and Team Trophies